While every movement that has for its object the reduction of hours of labor, or the advance of wages, has its social aspects, they are many times hardly discernible except to those directly interested. The machinist, the bricklayer or the printer may secure a reduction in working hours, or increased pay, and the cost is readily and easily shifted to the shoulders of the consumer. The change hardly is perceptible. Neither are the methods used to bring about the changed conditions of great public concern. A strike takes place, and if it arouses any interest at all, it is purely local. The average man will say, "I don't Tuesday
